

is accepted, you can introduce yourself and your company through chat. Once you find the right prospects, you start continuing communication through email or phone as earliest as possible. This is how LinkedIn works to get results.

Let us take an example. Consider that you send average 50 invites per day. Out of these 50 invites, 15 to 20 invites are accepted. It may result in 250 to 400 new prospects in a month. Then you start introducing yourself and your company. Once you feel that there is a chance of converting a prospect into paying customer, you start continuing communications on email or phone. You should follow a three-step process to get the results.

The very first step is to identify your target audience. This means you need to search and view the target profile. For this, you can use LinkedIn's Sales Navigator tool that provides 22 different filter categories to refine your search. These categories include Keywords, Industry, Company, Job Title, Geography, and many more. The second step is sending the connection request. Once you have viewed a profile, wait and see who views you back. When someone views you back, it indicates the sign of initial interest. Therefore, send a personalized connection request to those who have viewed your profile back. Once you send a personalized connection request always try to provide a reason to connect. This increases the chances of acceptance. Again, you need to wait to see who accepts your request. If somebody does not accept your request, it indicates that the person is not interested. In this case, sending a follow-up message after a few days may work out. Once someone accepts your connection request, send the person a message and set up a time for discussion. Then, you start building a relationship with your target.
