

want to be heard, through singing, or perhaps you are a great dancer or even a stand-up comedian; you can make a video, the funnier, the better! Motivating people and providing handy hints could also be another reason why the medium is so popular.

A lot of the initial TikTok videos were cringe videos. For a long time, TikTok thrived on them. The videos gained popularity as it included an awkward act or an embarrassment scene performed to perfection. Later these got glued to the comic version. Thus any awkward looking face would either reiterate a joke or the way the characters unfurled added the much needed laughter.

A lot of their videos were also replete with challenges. In fact there was a time when challenge was the key punch line in most video formats. The Ice bucket challenge, stair step challenge and the recent one being the bottle cap challenge are all examples of this. The trend seems to have caught on enticing viewers to be a part of each challenge depicted. The seeming voluntary acceptance has made this a community of sorts.

Expected ROI

With the miraculous strategy that TikTok uses, a lot of companies have proposed the idea of advertising and creating a network. So until the ball rolls in this direction, most companies make money with their direct engagement with the brands. Once word spreads; the brands usually follow them. That has been the trend so far. The people's strategy of making them follow a brand has been super successful in earning money from TikTok. Reports state that companies have been known to pay $200 to $20,000 per branded video promoted by influencers, depending on the individual's level of influence.

Videos related to the brand helps either directly or indirectly. For example, the video may be of a product or the product may be, for example worn by the presenter, in case of a fashion house. Wearing a label on camera is the most direct way of entering millions of households within minutes. Once good income pours in this can lead the promoters to use other platforms like YouTube to generate further income. So in case you're thinking of selling or promoting a brand; TikTok, in many scenarios, is the place to be.

What products work best

With some amount of risk involved; there are some brands that have experimented by advertising on TikTok. Universal Pictures, for example, had its