

What makes Snapchat different from other social networking sites is the momentary element of the pictures and videos that you share. Within a few seconds, your content will disappear after your friends have viewed it. This doesn't happen on Facebook or Twitter. If you post something on Facebook, you can view it years later. But that is not the case with Snapchat. You click a photo, send it to your friend, and once they've seen it, it disappears within seconds.

There is no need to look perfect or think about how many likes or comments you will receive. Just take a photo and it'll be gone before you know it.

The success of snapchat was inevitable. Snapchat has its own news feed where you can post a photo or a video as a story that your friends can see, instead of sending it to them privately. These photos or videos are posted as stories and they disappear after 24 hours. Popular messaging apps like Whatsapp have also introduced this feature after the success of Snapchat.

Why should you pick Snapchat?

There may have been times where you've thought "why Snapchat?" What is so great about Snapchat that it's becoming a phenomenon and is being used by millions of people around the world? You open your Snapchat and the first thing you see is your camera. Not any random news, status, or even a quote—but your camera. That's the most valuable strategy of Snapchat. The central idea of Snapchat is to engage its users into clicking images and sending it to their friends.

The most significant reason to pick Snapchat is its privacy. Snapchat's CEO Evan Spiegel has focused on the app's privacy in a better way. It not only secures your private information, but also makes sure your data is safe as well. It is solely your decision as to with whom you wish to share your content. If you send a photo on Snapchat, the app allows you to send it to all of your friends or keep it as a story. If you want to make it public, it will be public. You can keep it private as well.
