

themselves to their targeted Audience as selected by them through their WhatsApp Business Account. Now, this is a big step, a potentially huge one, to be honest. WhatsApp is bringing in what was potentially missing from the platform as far as businesses are concerned!

The addition of paid advertisements changes the whole scenario and adds a huge list of potential customers who were missing. This means a wider customer base for WhatsApp marketers, a wider reach for businesses and a whole lot of new strategies being applied to WhatsApp that are similar to other Facebook domains such as Facebook and Instagram.

Expected Return on Investment

To term it simply, WhatsApp doesn't need investments financially as such, and the only investment required is in the messages sent through the WhatsApp Business Account that too for enterprises also known as WhatsApp Business API starts after 24 hours of contact and is at nominal prices. This means the return on Investment for WhatsApp financially is always positive, no matter how small, because the basic initial cost of downloading the application and using it as a message service is nil.

While one can argue that executing his/her WhatsApp marketing strategy would need dedicated individuals just like other Facebook platforms to handle their business marketing account on the application, it is also true that it doesn't really come under the investment directly made in WhatsApp other than whatever little is made while paying for messages for the business-accounts as of now.

Otherwise, you can always hire third-party individuals to do all the spamming on WhatsApp for you, but that too, according to reports, hasn't come out as a successful investment with SMSs generating more ROI than any Bulk Marketer tool or individual for WhatsApp is doing.

As of now there is no shying away from the net return on a small investment, but this margin could change very soon. Read on.
