

8. It's not just about challenges. It's about the correlation with the brand too. Take, for instance, Google which ran a hashtag campaign #HeyGoogleHelp. Users had to create videos using Google Assistant or any other Google Voice products. The key message here is not to tell users what to do but to give them a direction and complete freedom as to what and how to proceed.
9. As Stefan Heinrich, Head of Global Marketing, TikTok, opines, "If I go as a marketer to another platform I get likes, shares or comments. If I get a video on TikTok, I get 20 to 30 minutes of a person's time to create and share." This is the essence of the app. So, think beyond like, share, comment, subscribe. Think in terms of interaction and seeing the other person posting a video on the idea planted by you.
10. Cross-promotion – Another feature of TikTok is that it is very easy to download videos. So, imagine the exposure when the videos posted on TikTok can be seen by new users on YouTube, Instagram, Facebook or Twitter. For example, ever since TikTok video clips of NyanNyan-Cosplay dancing to iLOVEFRiDAY's "Mia Khalifa" came on YouTube, the song's hits also increased. Don't look at a challenge as an isolated strategy, rather accentuate it by showcasing it on other platforms for a higher online presence.

11. Limited time – Make the challenges or contests time-bound. Month-long contests are unheard of in TikTok. Short videos demand short time frames. It is not like the users will not connect with a brand in such a short timeframe or forget about the Challenge or contest. Like the GUESS campaign (#InMyDenim) was for a week only. So, don't sabotage your content by stretching it; keep it brief, to the point.
