

The king of bite-sized content

It's interesting, it's cringey, it's TikTok. With over 500 Million Active Users per month (as per Datareportal, 2019) TikTok is without a doubt one of the largest social media platforms in existence. What started off as separate ecosystems in China as Douyin and in the US as Musical.ly has coalesced and grown into a gargantuan sub-culture that has penetrated into the farthest and remotest villages around the world. We don't believe that with 500 million users, it can be termed a sub-culture anymore. It's very much mainstream and with Instagram dropping likes, it's also turning out to be the go to platform for stream of influencers leaving Instagram in what can be termed as a social media exodus.

For the average person, TikTok isn't doing anything different from what Vine did a couple of years ago. And Vine died under Twitter (the same can be said for Periscope), TikTok seems to be scaling new heights with each month. The UI is astonishingly simple to use, the result of which is the widespread adoption among the rural population which is usually slow to adopt new apps and features that sport a steep learning curve. The element of discovery has been polished to the point that you can quickly discover and connect with TikTokers who are making content that appeals to your liking. There's something about the platform which makes it alluring to everyone, which is why we see so many active creators on the platform. And like all platforms, there are certain methods and tricks that'll help you grow your TikTok profile to new heights.

Our focus with this FastTrack has been to cater to both, the users as well as the folks who want to build awareness on the platform. We start off with treating TikTok as any other content platform with the focus on
