

have gained their status over time. Because certain celebrities appeal to specific demographics and target audiences, businesses wishing to attract such customers may employ the influencer in favour of their brand to encourage or help their fans.

- b) Market influencers- These are everyday people who are followed by numerous users because of their personality or sometimes, even looks. The audience gets a sense of 'realness' from these influencers because they are normal people that happen to have a sizeable following. Thus, the products they recommend tend to be bought, since followers believe in their authenticity.
- c) Micro-influencer- These are also known as expert influencers, and because of their knowledge of a particular field, everyday individuals have gained following and topical authority. The viewers have faith in their judgment when they suggest or compliment an item.

Pitching for Campaigns

TikTok users can be involved in paid partnerships and create a powerful advertising campaign. One small example is #TikTokChallenges. Because TikTok's design is so odd, brands must be imaginative to get their audience's attention. This innovative and fast-paced app may not be supplied with a simple ad or a supported influencer approval. Whilst it will be too early to draw up a list of good practices for advertising TikTok, it's a good time to begin to draw inspiration from brands that have thought outside the box and handled the app.
