

4. Spot existing influencers of similar niche
5. Cross-check various platforms

Next, decide if your target audience is on TikTok and, if so, see who will better respond to it. Do not think that TikTok creators with the most supporters will have the most impact.

Carefully study the influencers that are the most relevant and, if applicable, how they affect purchasing choices.

Sometimes a targeted search on Google will produce useful results. It starts by searching for “top developers of TikTok” to find some of the most prominent influencers of TikTok.

For example, typing in “TikTok fitness content creators” could be a logical starting point for you as a fitness clothing brand.

Yet, you must remember that TikTok is still young and the lists of top creators are changing constantly.

One thing to note about TikTok is how little navigational control is offered by the desktop experience. The mobile app is ideal for users who scan for similar Hashtags, user handles, and keywords and they can find the content they are looking for easily.

Go to the Discover page from there and enter your search terms in the top search bar. Current trend videos are listed by brands from the tabs “Up,” “Users,” “Videos,” “Sounds.”

Similar to the Discover page search features, you can find the video content on the site, which is marked with #ad. This methodology allows marketers to quickly determine if current influencers are worth exploring collaboration opportunities.

Ultimately, it’s a good practice to test influencers which are already popular social media on other social media sites such as Instagram and YouTube. Influencers of all sizes typically have a strong channel presence, which means they can also have a growing TikTok base if they’re