

not just on TikTok. The only difference is that on TikTok, the audience actually demands consistency. Video creation on a regular basis takes a lot of commitment and hard work. That is the reason companies prefer writing blogs over creating videos. However, they haven't realized that marketing through videos is much more effective than articles.

So, needless to say, TikTok takes the crown when it comes to marketing through videos. After all, everyone is on it already. Those who are not, are watching TikTok videos on YouTube, Facebook, and Instagram.

The main point? If none of your marketing strategies works, one will and that's posting regularly on TikTok. The benefit? More followers or sales! Having said that, you still have a long way to go!

When we mention the word 'consistency', we don't just mean regular posts, we also mean regular good quality videos, in terms of content and not necessarily production.

What would you do with a regular new audience who see your content deteriorating on a daily basis? You can bet that they will steer clear of from your page and videos, whenever they come across it.

We all want to feel independent and want to make it big on our own. However, sometimes working with some of your competitors is inevitable and profitable.

You aren't working in a vacuum, the audience might like you but maybe there is another they like even more. Therefore, you have to take a step towards collaboration and create content that drives your audience towards that follow button.

Another benefit of collaboration is that you get a chance to see a different side of the same platform. They might have a different perspective and sharing your idea of content can give you a better insight into an artist's mind. Their ideas could transform numbers on your feed and you might just get an idea for a viral video. Hence, it's a win-win situation for both.
