

more viewers. Otherwise, your post will be buried under other viral posts on the platform. We assume you aren't going to like that. Putting in thought and effort into content is extremely tough and nobody likes it if their effort goes unnoticed. Sensible move? Post when your audience is scrolling their feed.

Crowdsource feedback

We all need some kind of feedback to know that we are on the right track. So, if you are unsure about the quality of your videos, you can ask your audience to give you a review. The only thing you need to ensure is that the question isn't too direct. If you are going to post, "Do you like the content I have been posting?" No friend of yours is going to tell you that they don't like something about your videos. However, if you twist our words and ask them if they want you to work on some element of your videos then you might get the response you have been wanting.

Once the audience starts telling you the aspects they want you to improve, you can start working on them for a better outcome. For honest feedback, you need to frame your questions carefully.

Adjust posting frequency

This one, is something you need to think over. It depends on the number of ideas you have for your content. You need to keep in mind that if you post too little, there will be less engagement which will eventually lead to lesser traffic. On the other hand, if you are putting numerous posts in a day, you can be sure of the fact that most of your efforts are going to be in vain.
