

virtual, main-made world of the internet, is not always advised. A break is definitely much needed.

1. Your electronics can dull your senses: Electronics, no matter how useful they are in your daily lives, can be the cause of dulled senses and a blunt perspective. Although you can do almost everything online, with a click of your finger, it does not always play to your advantage. Using the internet too much and too often can result in an indulgent, undisciplined personality that you will definitely like to avoid.
2. You may lose interest in the things that you initially liked doing: Remember when you loved painting, reading books and singing to your heart's content every day? Or, when you played your favourite instrument and mesmerised your audience? With the overuse of electronics, you either have, or you may gradually lose interest in all your hobbies. As a result, you will not only lose your talent but also your interest in becoming better at any real-world activities.

3. Social media can become a cause of stress: Social media, in spite of being of great use, can become a mental burden sometimes. This is the result of fake news and unwarranted comments that float into your news feed. It is almost impossible to overlook these if you are online all the time. Hence, to handle the negative effects of social - media, it makes sense to take a break. (PS: Once you take a break from social media, you will realise there is so much more beyond it!)

4. You will get to spend quality time with your family and friends: The people who keep you going, the ones who help you survive the daily struggles are your family and friends. They are a part of your real-world, not mere profile pictures on attractive forums. Hence, it is important that you pay attention to them. Giving them a call, planning a sleepover, or simply gossiping with them can be far more rejuvenating than meddling with your electronics.
5. The real world gives you the exposure that the virtual world cannot: Although the virtual world is full of opportunities, it is really not much
