

Bug hunter

If you want to get into the elusive career of bug hunting, then here's everything you need to know to get started

Chances are, you have heard or read about ethical hackers. These geeks get rewards for successfully detecting and reporting bugs in the company's websites or systems. Young and professional techies and application security testers are steadily growing as a community lurking on the internet, in search of loopholes in multimillion-dollar online businesses in the hope of getting rewarded as they report one. Bug bounty hunters, also known as bug hunters are ethical hackers who hunt bugs as an art of detecting and reporting security issues or bugs in online businesses, websites, and apps. Instead of misusing this loophole, these bug hunters, with full responsibility, disclose it to the firm with a proof of concept explaining how the bug is caught or detected.
