

The coronavirus has drastically changed the way we work. Since working together in a shared physical space is dangerous, people have been working together virtually. Tech companies have taken note of this, and have been continuously improving their services to make working at home seamless and less stressful. Microsoft Teams has been one of the front runners in making things easier for teams working together virtually.

With the slew of features unveiled under Microsoft Ignite 2020, Microsoft has taken another significant stride to further its intentions of helping people work together effortlessly. Features such as Together mode, custom layouts, breakout rooms, meeting recap, etc., have added a whole new dimension to Microsoft Teams. Here are some of the best features Microsoft has announced recently to make the experience better.

Collaborate without a hitch

Identify the teams you need to make for your organisation. Once you've done that, create different channels for each team. Make sure that one team member is not involved in too many channels, and create relevant and useful channels. Creating too many teams and channels will prove to be counterproductive.

Channels can be made keeping in mind the goals to be achieved within a team, and who it is to be achieved by. By doing this, you are setting up an operation that helps participants perform better to achieve an objective.

General and private channels

Add people from your team, and then create different channels based on the variables you like. You can have private channels for departments, managers, projects, and any other variables of your choice. Channels should be such that it helps participants organise and collaborate to achieve a joint objective.

When you create a team, a general channel is automatically created, where everyone is added. You can use this channel initially to discuss which teams
