

in-game ads. Due to simplified game mechanics and design, hyper-casual game developers can rely more on ads to monetize their products rather than spending precious time to find and balance the monetary aspects.

In the past, mobile gamers seeking multiplayer games and complex, hardcore experiences could only find them on consoles and PC. Now, satisfying hardcore gaming experiences can be found in the mobile format. Mobile gamers who spend their time with hardcore titles more likely wish seeing an increase in their playtime as compared to players who favour casual games. Through games like Arena of Valor, Clash Royale, and Clash of Clans, mobile gaming has entered the competitive landscape. Players are spending more time on streaming and e-sports alongside active play. This will likely result in influencer marketing becoming increasingly popular in mobile gaming.

Image Source: Supercell.com

Games that occupy the middle ground between the hardcore and hyper-casual may not lean heavily into the trends that define the extreme ends of the spectrum. They are likely to be influenced by the competitive nature of hardcore titles and the ad monetisation options of the hypercasual segment. As developers pick and choose from these attributes, it's entirely likely that new kinds of games will emerge.

Console, PC, and Mobile Trends

75 per cent of console gamers find existing IP helpful when selecting a game to play, with 49 per cent of console game purchasers remaining loyal to some franchises even if their last edition was not as good as earlier entries to the series.