

nities has grown and changed. Community steers the discovery of new games, in-game purchases, and overall engagement. On console, communities have an increasingly significant impact on the time people spend in a single play session and impact the likelihood that they'll come back to a game time and time again.

'Community gamers' see gaming as a way to connect with others. They encompass large groups of people, spread across geographical territories, who enjoy sharing the gaming experience and helping each other find new games to play. When a community gamer discovers a new game they like, they are likely to bring their whole crew with them. They are also two to four times more likely than other mobile gamers to play for more than three hours a day. Community gamers outspend regular gamers. They are two to four times more likely to buy a game or make an in-game purchase.

Companies must learn to join in on their community's discussion. 89 per cent of console gamers want to hear from the brands they made a purchase from. Think about how you can add value to the groups that form around your title, like sharing information about upcoming events or tips to improve gameplay. Listen to and learn from the players who are your most engaged and highest spending. They may spark an idea for a new in-game feature, or your next marketing campaign. Creators like GoodGameBro are forming their own communities built around positivity and inclusiveness. These communities act as ambassadors for their brand.

The Future is 5G

The expectations of anyone who plays a video game will be higher with the arrival of 5G networks. Download speeds in gigabytes and drive latency will be under ten milliseconds. Faster, more stable connections, the rise of subscription models, and cloud gaming are poised to disrupt the industry even further.

Developed Markets

In the live streaming world, YouTube hosted five YouTube Gaming charity contests in Mexico, the US, and Europe to support COVID-19 relief efforts. Several creators such as LazarBeam, Lyna, MortaL, TheDonato, and Typical Gamer stream exclusively on YouTube, with Valkyrae having become one of the greatest female live streamers across all platforms.

While Twitch continues to be the leader in live streams with 7.75 million hours streamed every month, YouTube is quickly catching up to the beh-