

according to the players. The larger experience of gaming might overlook these issues. But, when you involve an interactive community created by streaming platforms, these identity markers can play a huge role in differentiating you with mainstream competitors.

When you are live streaming, 30 per cent of your viewers are likely to comment on the videos. Many would like to give feedback and suggestions if your videos are reaching a good viewership. You should be open to criticisms and welcome these suggestions if you think they work for you. Many times, you would also get recommendations for the next game they would like from you. Very few of these suggestions might be relevant if you have already been researching and following other streamers. However, do count these suggestions to plan your next videos. If the audience wants a specific game, you should provide them with that, and if not, you should have a good reason for it.

Role of Community Interactions

Community interactions are one of your greatest assets in analysing your audience and their demands. You should encourage these conversations in your streaming, which will help you get more feedback to improve your content and plan your future course of action. Most of these conversations lead to large forums of discussion and can determine major gaming trends.

These interactions are fun to engage with, as you will encounter all kinds of reactions. You should always express your appreciation for your
