

Source: Verge.com

Live streaming games on Twitch

which means that as long as there is commentary, description, review, criticism, news reporting, teaching etc. of the gameplay, the individual can broadcast it legally without seeking permission from or payment to the copyright holders. However, most of the video games have copyrighted music that the music creators can claim.

To avoid this, creators either play their music or put the video games on mute. Twitch has an alternative for this, using the fully licensed soundtrack by Twitch or other cleared music libraries such as Chillhop, Monstercat Gold, Soundstripe etc. They even suggested reading the End User License Agreement at the beginning of these games to understand the terms covering streaming it with the music.

YouTube Gaming

With the ease of use and better accessibility, YouTube offers many gaming channels to its users. It is the other most popular live streaming platform, which has a majority of its traffic driven by video game live streaming. Under the YouTube Creator Academy, the copyright section clearly states that only the content created by an individual or is authorized to use can be uploaded. If violated, such videos can be taken down. There are also content ID claims made by the party who owns the music, movie, TV show, video game etc. which can result in a takedown or even revenue loss.