

You will need slightly different hardware for livestreaming board games since the game will be spread across a table or even multiple rooms as we have seen in the Covid-19 pandemic era. Fortunately, there are simple apps such as Vorpal Board which allow you to hook up your smartphones as cameras and provides a simple widget for you to include into your livestreaming application. It can even scan your cards and manage them into neat decks. Then you can throw digital dice which can be anything, from a simple six-sided D6 to a D20. Vorpal Board doesn't support every table top game under the sun but with the component scanning and deck management you should be able to make do with some table top games.

Tabletop gaming

To figure out what to stream, simply check out the most popular table top games out there and start from that. Keep an eye out for new launches and always listen to what your audience is looking for.

Popular games to stream

Gaming has always drawn some sort of audience, whether it's millions of viewers tuning into an esports event or a few friends watching you play on the couch. Some games are recent and trending, like the ones you can find on this list, and others have been around for years and have a large following. They differ in price, content and art styles, and you will find something new that you can bring to a future gathering or Twitch stream, more likely than not.