

The world is adjusting to a new reality (and a new economy) in a post-pandemic world, embellished with the charms of almost everything that defies convention to generate more than a happy buck. Live streaming has grown at an even faster pace to become a source of livelihood for countless individuals. The dystopia we saw on the silver screen and admired on our consoles since the early eighties is most definitely upon us. And it is up to the non-decadent warriors of fibernet connectivity to break the spell of mundane playthroughs and IRL streams to stand apart from the crowd. All whilst ushering in a glorious era of eye-twitching revenue, through the thumb-twitching talent. It's time to welcome the live-gamers into the big billionaires' club.

If you're reading this piece, you already identify as a rebel of the highest order— someone who has seen through the cracks of elusive reality and into the sea of potential that lies in the act of building a true legion (read audience) for yourself, to keep your champions champion-ing behind your back, and to rake in the moolah through ways more than one. We're obviously talking about beating the platform algorithm to ensure that your streams are shown to as many viewers as possible.

Ragnarok is upon us, gentle souls! Let this be your guide into the darkness for you must emerge a winner on the other side.

Image Credits: Unsplash

Sites like the Twitch homepage provide a public list of all the trending game titles.