

Boss Mode 101: The Title Matters! Choose Wisely.

When you're trying to decide what title to play for your next live stream, please remember that name-dropping still works in the new world of digital glamour. If you want to start with a clear revenue target, then be sure to select a title that's new and popular, and definitely not the stuff of yesterday.

You want to put out a stream that doesn't have to compete for attention because it's about something that has already caught the public's attention. This way, your channel gets discovered faster, by more people, and your legion grows stronger by the hour.

Sites like the Twitch homepage continue to provide a public list of all the trending game titles, updated very frequently, so you can check them out for ideas if you're running short. It will always be in your interest to complete the necessary groundwork before you jump into the battleground.

It's the art of war, to be honest. We'd advise that you go the whole nine yards and do a little snooping around to figure out what title is doing the rounds on popular news outlets, and if you can manage to get your hands on something as rare as a pre-release copy, then you're golden.

Hang around Facebook groups such as “Media Movements” to follow updates from publicists who want to speak with early-access/beta gamers.

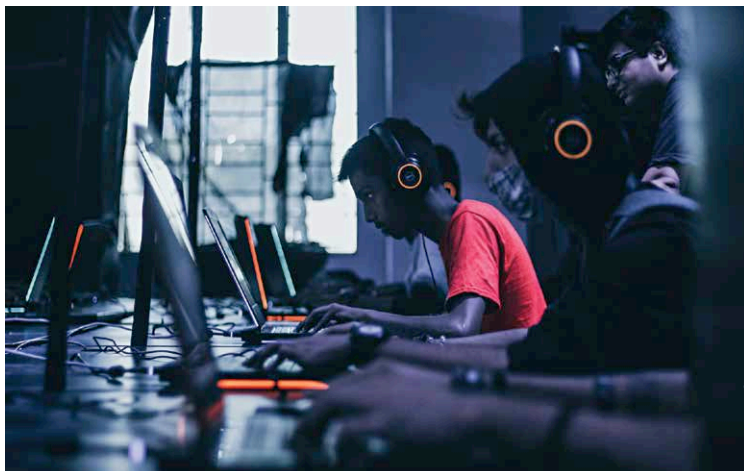

Image Credits: Unsplash

The audience gets hooked to live-streaming games when gamers show discipline and consistency in their schedule.