

Boss Mode 102: Consistency = Discipline = Success.

The first thing they always make you watch in almost any movie about ninjas is the struggle. And that's when the audience gets hooked too because discipline and consistency have very long term spillover effects.

Commit this to memory— you cannot sustain an audience if you don't cater to them constantly. And, just like the creative autonomy of former bards and yesteryear jests, you too have the power to select and define your schedule.

Simply said, don't commit to a daily stream if you know you can't keep up with that schedule.

The ideal way to go about this is to give yourself a week or two to churn out volumes, understand what frequency works best for your schedule, and then make that schedule a part of your regular CTAs or any other communication you use with your audience.

Promise a decent level of consistency, and then deliver on that promise, and you're on your path to live-streaming glory.

Image Credits: Unsplash

One of the most popular ways of keeping the conversation going is by explaining your strategy to new audience members.

Boss Mode 103: Play The Game, Play The Man

Like every other successful art form, live-streaming a game feed is also a conversation. And at every step, you have to keep the conversation going.