

Don't expect to sit silently as you aim for perfect headshots, and for your audience to find something to do with that time and silence. It is upon you, soldier, to keep the platoon engaged.

We're not asking you to try and become someone you're not— if you don't feel too out there, then you don't have to exert yourself into becoming one. But remember that talking and explaining yourself are not necessarily extrovert behaviours. Applied well, they can become great tools of communication and engagement.

As your years of gaming pile on, you tend to develop your style and commentary over levels and engines and characters. Use that knowledge to give your audience insights into who you are. This helps build your gaming brand like nothing else.

Also, try to explain your strategy to new audience members, it's one of the most popular ways of keeping the conversation going, during an otherwise visually violent screen.

Image Credits: Unsplash

Thanking all your new subscribers is an excellent way to keep up good morale in your legion.

Boss Mode 104: Be Grateful, General

Your audience is always looking up to you for entertainment and validation about how they spend their own time. This is the core psychology behind recurring views, subscribers, and everything else that adds to your gaming bottom line.