

It's essential to pick a pond and then be the biggest fish in it because when you're all over the place, you don't really have room to grow.

Image Credits: Ursplash

Make better content decisions by figuring out the correlation between your social media numbers and the content you put out in a set time frame.

Boss Mode 106: Don't Hate the Hashtag

Social media is a good thing, no matter how many thousands of dollars get spent on the advertising that you carefully make your way around. We understand how you feel about selling out or pandering to the needs of the consumer mainstream, but you must understand this— your audience lives, breathes and sails on social media.

For you to keep your gaming conversation going with them, for you to be able to communicate your incentives to your legion, for you to be able to set out your hooks for the next stream, you have to be where they are.

A consistent and witty Twitter feed goes a long way in charging up your fans and followers to celebrate the fact that they regularly watch your content. You don't necessarily have to turn into a social media analyst and start measuring your engagement in terms of retweets and likes, but it doesn't hurt if you do that either.

If you're smart enough to figure out a correlation between your social media numbers for a given week and the content you put out in that same