

The preview tells the audiences what's coming next for them and you can gauge their interest. Most streaming platforms have a feature that allows you to send posts and notifications to your subscribers telling them your streaming schedule or which game you are about to look for. You can even give out personal updates to develop a better connection with them.

A summary is a crucial part of any digital content. With livestreams, you can capture the memorable moments and edit them up to make a highlight reel which can then be uploaded to your channel or posted on your social media handles. It's another form of engagement that is easy to accomplish.

2. Use transitions

Nobody likes dead air. Back in the days when DTH Services weren't available, certain channels used to have dead air at night. And even between shows if one show got over a little early. It's very annoying and can quickly lose you your audience. Folks these days have negligible attention spans and they'll jump from your stream if you don't have something running for more than 5 seconds. So always use transitions.

Simple transitions make a difference

There are plenty of web sites such as Motion Array which have pre-made templates for you to use in your livestreams. Simply modify it a little to add a touch of personalisation and branding. And use it. Transitions show the
