

those with a higher position. There are two main types of roles that you can assign a member of your server.

Hierarchical roles are roles that follow a particular order of precedence. The higher among this set of roles will have more permissions as compared to the others. Additionally, roles higher up in the hierarchy will also have access to a larger roster of settings than the rest. Higher roles can also change the roles of those below them and upgrade or downgrade them. However, peers cannot be upgraded or downgraded.

Exclusive roles can be assigned to any user based on criteria that you might have previously set. For example, you may divide your users according to their geographic location, the teams they are a part of, and the games that they play. Each of these roles will accordingly have different permissions in different channels.

Voice channels in Discord

Another distinctive feature of Discord is voice channels. Voice channels may be considered to be online conference rooms in which anyone can walk in and engage in discussions. Needless to say, there are specific permissions that govern who gets to access voice channels. Multiple voice channels can be created on Discord, each of them potentially dealing with a different topic of discussion. They are also a much better way of allowing the users
