There's a very good reason, or rather a couple of good reasons, why Microsoft is reportedly offering USD 10 billion to acquire Discord. It's one of the best social platforms out there with all sorts of features that help communities thrive. Discord is best known as a VoIP client that competes with the likes of TeamSpeak and RaidCall. It's only when you start using Discord that you realise how versatile the platform actually happens to be.

Discord completely does away with all the entry barriers that plagues similar platforms in the past. Setting up your own Discord account and joining a server takes less than five minutes and getting the hang of how a typical server is organised takes a few more. It's focus on bringing people together is evidenced by the fact that it has grown to be the most popular platform in the least amount of time.

Discord is used by gamers to come together and party up for a few quick rounds in their favourite video games, share the freshest and dankest memes, to discover new communities and even build their own for no cost at all. And where the gamers are, the whole industry follows. Game developers have been using Discord to run their beta tests and interact with gamers to get direct feedback on their titles rather than taking the convoluted path of setting up focus groups and what not. And recently, we've started seeing mainstream acceptance as well. Companies are using Discord in the same way they'd use Slack, Flock or Microsoft Teams.
