

assigning them assignments and allowing them time to refresh, pause, and relax. Know that you're all together on this journey.

Know your team

Above everything, familiarity is the cornerstone of a strong moderation squad. You'll be able to talk to your fellow moderators more if you know more about them, what they do, and where they stay. You'll hear about people's strengths and limitations, get a deeper understanding of them and get a sense of where they need support and vice-versa. Despite the fact that you are all in different time zones and come from various perspectives, we strive for much the same goal: maintaining the group you all care for securely. Who knows, you might learn that you have a lot of similar passions all along the route, make fantastic close acquaintances, or strengthen established connections throughout your tenure as moderators.

Copyright attribution: Photo by anonymous licensed under CC BY-NC-SA

Know your team

- Enable current and new moderators to write a short introduction for themselves. Everybody throughout their project would have a basic idea as to where they're working from as a result of this.
- Speaking with one another is an integral part of the equation, much as it is in any other partnership. Start engaging new members in discussions and make everyone feel at home on the panel.
- Provide assistance to the admins, or keep tabs with them if they're not seen for a while. Giving constructive thoughts is also an excellent way