

1. Managing Appeals

Moderators, like everyone else, face failure. It is essential to have a mechanism in place for consumers to challenge notices and suspensions if they think they were given arbitrarily. If you wish to keep a public violations log, you may hear feedback from individuals who were not interested in the situation in support of notified people if they believe the notice was released wrongly. Though that can help with transparency if a customer is too afraid to attempt to challenge their alert, it can still waste the moderator team's time by including someone who does not absolutely comprehend the case.

Copyright attribution: Photo by YANA MCCONATY is licensed under CC BY-NC-SA

Implementing Transparency

Copyright attribution: Photo by anonymous is licensed under CC BY-NC-SA

Managing Appeals

2. Server rules and penalties

Your server rules act as the basis of your moderation scheme. They outline how the participants can act and what will happen if they fail to fulfil those standards. In general, the guidelines should be clear enough to guarantee

Copyright attribution: Photo by Dan Swinhoe is licensed under CC BY-NC-SA

Server rules and regulations