

Introduction

Over the past few years, the growth of Discord as a community-building platform has been rather conspicuous. Having gained momentum from within the gaming community in its initial days, Discord has now undergone considerable growth and transformation to establish itself as a platform of choice for marketers and businesses alike. Besides providing them with a channel to effectively engage with their customers and users, it also presents them with a promising space to conduct all of their brand-building activities and scale up their operations in the process. As a result, even though this text and voice chat platform has been operational in the market for approximately 5 years, its monthly user count stands at a staggering 140 million. Specifically developed to host communities, Discord comprises a bevy of features such as member roles, channels, and bots, that make community-building a highly convenient affair. However, building a community is only a job half done. The real challenge lies in interacting with this community at regular intervals and fostering engagement practices that are completely aligned with their whims and fancies. This is where Discord Community Insights come into the picture.

Understanding community insights

In order to improve the community engagement experience, Discord furnishes its community hosts with insights that shed light on the many inherent behavioural characteristics of their constituent members. All hosts need to do to tap into this reserve is enable the community feature on the server on which they're hosting the said community. With Discord Insights at their disposal, the host is not only able to better understand the manner in which their community members interact and engage with the server but also helps them gain an accurate idea of each individual member's personality traits. Subsequently, this gives them the space to devise and develop community engagement strategies and campaigns that are increasingly tailor-made for their target audience. Budding businesses and startups are the ones that benefit the most from Discord Insights, for it helps them develop a brand image that is in complete sync with the demands and expectations of their customers.

Additionally, it also allows them to curate a range of products and services that stand to provide them with the best returns on investment. For a community host or a business to become thoroughly familiar with their members, they must acquaint themselves with the fundamental behavioral
