

Empathy

With so many messaging apps out and about, there have been several attempts at converging multiple services into one app. We've even heard about Facebook's plans of merging messenger, WhatsApp and Instagram's messaging service into a combined platform. So it's not a pipe dream anymore and services like Empathy are exactly what we'll end up using in the long run.

Empathy is an instant messaging app that supports multiple protocols which enable text, voice, file transfers and other inter-application communications. It supports SIP, MSNP, XMPP so you can even use Google's chat services via the app. If you've ever used any Linux distro that came with the GNOME desktop, then you should be familiar with Empathy as it's included by default.

App/site link: wiki.gnome.org/Apps/Empathy