

On both, mobile and desktop, every time you visit a new website and enter your credentials, LastPass will prompt you to add the login ID and password to your vault. You can choose to add the credentials from right there, instead of going in and adding the credentials separately for each app or service that you use.

Sometimes paper & pen do the trick

Writing down your passwords may not be as bad a thing as the people say it is. Unless you are writing down your password and sticking it to your monitor bezel, it is often better to have a written account of all your passwords. You can have a sealed envelope with the password to your phone and password managers, which you put away into, say, a safe box. There is no better place to store your sensitive information than, off the internet, in the confines of a literal safe. What this does it that in case something goes sideways in your life, your loved ones can use that envelope to make sure that your information on the internet is taken care of in the best ways possible.

Turn on automatic updates of your operating system and applications you use

In the world that we live in, anything can happen at any time, especially
