

Do everything privately

We know social media is meant to share things, but some things are better shared with a restricted group than the whole world.

On Facebook, changing who can see your information can be a good first step. You can first lock your profile, which means that no one outside your friends will be able to see the profile picture and timeline of your account. Then, you can configure each bit of information individually to be visible to either your friend's list, your friends of friends, or the general public. Of course, Mr Zuckerberg can see it all, but he is least likely to do something bad with the information that he has regarding you, and whether you decide that you will be a dog person and not a cat person. Likewise, every social media platform these days provides options to configure your information to make sure that a limited number of people can see it. Take some time off your day and change the settings according to how you want them to be.

Know who's the black sheep

When signing up for any service on the internet, one of the most commonly asked things is your email address. And there is no scarcity of instances where you signed up for a service with your email, and then from the very next day, your inbox started to fill up with spam messages.
