

Thankfully, there's a trick to keeping track of and finding out from where all the spam in your email is coming from.

If you are a Gmail user, this is for you. While entering your email address, what you would need to do is, add a '+' followed by the website name before the @gmail.com. Your email should look something like this: xyz+abc.com@gmail.com. The email that you get, which is addressed to the above email, will land in your regular inbox, but there will be certain pieces of information attached, which would help you zero in on which website was the one that shared your information with others.

Google yourself

We are not asking you to be narcissistic here. But, what this does is, brings up all the information that is there in the eyes of Google, related to your name and presents it to you. So, say if you spot anything that you do not want to be there, you can simply go ahead and do that. Log on to <https://support.google.com/websearch/troubleshooter/3111061>, select the reason and category of information that you want to be removed from Google. Enter the information that is asked, and it will be done. There are many instances where certain information that you may not want to be out there or associated with your name is present somewhere, and if it is on Google, you can at least once a while Google your own

All of us have Googled our names. Haven't we
