

Never blindly trust in what is there on the internet. Always take precautions when it comes to these things.

You don't scan codes to receive money

When using UPI to pay or receive money, scanning a code or showing yours to be scanned is a common practice, and the mental conditioning of scanning the codes is such that the scammers try and feed on it. Claiming to transfer money to people's account, they ask them to scan a code and enter the amount of money that they want to/are set to receive. But the truth is, you never need to scan a code yourself to receive money. When at the receiving end of a transaction, you always have to show your code or share your UPI id to be entered by the individual who is to send you money. If someone says that you will need to scan a code to receive money, never believe them, because it is not true.

Shredding... It's the best!

Shred it

Yeah, it is what it is. If you have a paper or physical copy of a document, that has information which could potentially be harmful, and you don't know what to do with it, apart from returning it to the agency (in case of cards and identification cards) the best thing is to shred it. There is no better way of disposing of physical documents and there is no point