

Spoilt for choices

In this world, nothing is fool proof, but we would recommend using these as a basic step towards bettering your digital privacy from the real-world stalkers, who are out on the lookout for your data when you are at your most vulnerable state. There are a lot of positives, that these screen protectors bring along like protecting your phone from scratching and breaking, also providing health benefits at a certain level. But, before you drop the book or switch over to a new tab to order one for yourself, read some caveats that come along when using or buying these privacy protectors.

One of the things that might draw away some of you all from this is the limitation that comes along. This problem is basically a lot dependent on the manufacturer that you are going with, but still worthy knowing. Say that you have a screen protector that has a viewing angle such that you have to be head on while looking at your display. This would cause a lot of hinderance in your user experience, because from other angles, the viewing will be difficult or not possible. While on paper, this might be something that many would brush off, some who work in collaborative workspaces, where you need to show your screen to your peers, should have a look at the claimed viewing angles before you make a purchasing decision.
