

topics are really popular (and consequently harder to write about at first), as well as which ones they find more intriguing.

It's time to narrow down your sources now that you've decided on a theme.

3. Locate key information sources

If you've chosen a decent topic, you'll have a lot of resources to choose from. This is both a benefit and a drawback. A wide range of sources demonstrates that there is something worth saying about your subject, as well as providing you with lots of information to quote.

However, this abundance can rapidly become a nightmare, as you spend hours reading thick, mind-numbing material without coming any closer to actually writing a paper.

What can you do to prevent this from happening? Choose a few major sources and concentrate solely on them. Sure, you could need extra sources, especially if your work is large or if your professor requests them. However, if you try to read 15 sites at once, you'll quickly become overwhelmed and frustrated.

Concentrating on a few essential sources is effective since it allows you to:

- Go deep into the topic
- Explore a diverse set of topics
- Get more resources

Identify the right sources