

But what if I'm in the middle of a book? Isn't this going to take forever? No, because you won't be reading the full book.

Reading an entire academic book is overkill for most of the research you'll conduct in college. Simply skim the table of contents and the book itself for relevant chapters or parts. Then, as if you

The penultimate step before you start writing were reading an article, read each of them. Also, have a look at the book's bibliography, which is a treasure trove of extra resources.

Note: The above method is a somewhat modified version of the conventional SQ3R method, as we don't want to take notes from textbooks. You can read more about the SQ3R method at the end of this chapter.

5. Write an article or essay

Now that you've done your research, it is time to put it all together in a paper. If you were researching simply to gain information, then putting everything down in a nice and structured manner will always end up being an information resource that you can come back to later on.

Your magnum opus