

It takes time to build credibility to personal websites, social media profiles, or a portfolio, and if so, follow the links to verify the author's legitimacy.

Is this something that happened recently?

Examine the publication date of the article or report. When was it initially published, and when was it last updated? The date on which a source was created can reveal a lot about whether the material is still relevant, true, correct, or valuable. If you're seeking for the most up-to-date information about presidential candidates, for example, the timestamp on information sources might drastically alter the accuracy and usefulness of the material. Facts change throughout time, thus the more recent a report is, the better.

Does It evoke strong emotions?

Fake news and misinformation frequently try to evoke a strong or dramatic reaction by appealing to your emotions. Is the article or information source attempting to persuade you to feel a specific way?

Any story that tries to persuade you to feel strong emotions, regardless of the emotion - pleased, furious, sad, or surprised — is more likely to be prejudiced. Instead of informing you, a biased article author may be attempting to persuade you to believe certain views or support a cause. Look for information sources that contain the opposing viewpoint, such as contrasting
