Steps to organising email

If your email inbox has become out of hand, there are a few urgent steps you can take to regain control:

- Archive all of your previous emails. If you still have hundreds of emails from more than a month ago, transfer them to a new folder labelled “Archive.” You can always return to these later.
- Now, email by email, go through the remainder of your inbox. If an email is no longer necessary, delete it. If not, consider whether it is “active” - is there a specific action you or someone else has to do, or do you simply believe it is worthwhile to keep? If the latter, archive it.
- Delete emails that you no longer require. On a regular (preferably daily) basis, delete any minor or old communications from your inbox and dispatched items.
- Messages should be stored in folders. Create a hierarchical file directory for each subject, activity, or project.
- Personal emails should be kept separate. Create a distinct folder for these. Ideally, your work email account should not get any personal correspondence.
- Use attachments sparingly. Wherever possible, use alternative and more secure ways of data exchange (for further information, see ‘data sharing’). If attachments are utilised, ensure that they are version con-
