

- Learning a new language
- Learning grammar
- Exam preparation
- Essay writing
- Putting together presentations
- Generating concepts for projects
- Problem-solving
- Coming up with out-of-the-box ideas
- Memorising notes, books, and other materials
- Generating revision materials for examinations

Day-to-day life

- Time management
- Event management e.g. parties
- Setting life goals
- Keeping a journal
- Holiday preparations
- Organising your finances
- Keeping track of significant dates, events, and data

The things that can be accomplished and the amount of information that can be managed at once utilising mind maps are truly amazing. And this is only the tip of the iceberg in terms of what's conceivable.

Drawing a mind map

The method of creating a mind map is rather straightforward. All that is required is an understanding of the structure beneath it. Mind mapping is, in fact, a procedure that doesn't require much in the way of step-by-step instructions. All you need to do is keep in mind the following pointers and you should be good to go.

Step 1 - Take a huge sheet of paper and lay it out in front of you horizontally.

Step 2 - Draw a primary graphic that depicts the topic you'll be mapping that is fairly sized (coloured) and memorable. Alternatively, to symbolise that image, draw a circle and write some text inside it.