

Before you research

A brief primer on the entire process

While the word research might seem to be the domain of scientists or brainiacs, the simple fact is that research is fundamentally an attempt to answer a question. This could be a simple question such as “Why does cooking make food taste better?” to “What is the best possible way to make my social media profile image?”

You consult books, academic papers, newspaper articles, historical records, and anything else you can think of to find a solution to your query. “Sources” is a general phrase for these items.

And, once you’ve completed your study, you’ll normally present or summarise it in some form. This sometimes entails writing an essay or other scholarly work, but it could also entail giving a presentation or even making a YouTube video.
