The gold standard of widget customisation

Widgets have been around in Android phones for the longest time and they were and still are better than those you find on iOS. Trust us, we are not ranting about why iOS is worse than Android in terms of customisability but yes, widgets on any Android phone are highly customisable and even the addition of one or two widgets to your home screen can completely change the look of it.

If we classify the widgets, there are broadly two categories that the majority of them fall into. One is the “Beautification” category which includes widgets for the Clock or the Calendar, and then there are “Functional” widgets such as the Google Keep widget which will let you take notes right from the home screen or the Spotify widget which gives you the functionality of Play/Pause, Next, Back without opening the app.

Well, to be honest, there are a lot of individual widget apps that can get the job done if you are into something very specific. But the app that we have for you here is the GOLD standard of widgets and their customisation – KWGT (pronounced as kay-widget). Why? Well, simply because the
