

can browse through community submissions for custom made designs. There are options to sort for the top of the day, week, month or all time, and options to filter for certain style settings as well. There is a crazy amount of creativity on display here, with both clean muted minimalist styles and crazy loud RGB rainbow vomit, and everything in the middle. Of course, there are the same options to edit for these community styles as well.

Which brings us to the question, how do people even create these crazy custom looking layouts and styles? Well, that's where 'Create Styles' comes into play. This is the end game, you create a full style from scratch and have the power to customise every single aspect of it. A lot of the options here are similar to the ones in Style Settings and Customise, but there are new features, such as gradient animations, the direction to swipe for increasing the volume, the size of the pill, the icon type for each option or a global icon style, the appearing and disappearing animation, and so so much more. Going through everything would probably take an hour just by itself. One very interesting outcome of mixing the size of the pill with the fill or wave type slider meant that we can have just a circle as a volume slider, which looks incredibly unique.

On a final note, you can add extra shortcuts on the top of the Slider, such as the usual settings or sound settings, or more useful options such as taking a screenshot, altering the media output, enabling split screen and so on. Simply press the '+' (plus) icon in the style preview. There are even options to toggle DND (Do Not Disturb), auto-brightness,
