

Todoist

Todoist is a time management tool that also serves as a to-do list, with a dash of project management tossed in for good measure. Despite covering different genres, the application is simple to use, allowing you to manage multiple projects and see what you still need to do at a look.

To do or not to do. Obviously you have to do!

The website or app gives you a daily and weekly overview of what you need to get done, what appointments you have, and whatever else you choose to keep track of. You can assign responsibilities to others if you're working with a group.

The free version restricts you to working with five individuals and having 80 active projects at any given time, which should be plenty for most users, but Premium and Business plans are available for a cost. Todoist integrates with dozens of apps and services, allowing it to seamlessly integrate into your existing workflow.

Toggl

Toggl's developers describe it as "insanely simple time tracking," and that's a pretty accurate description. There is a free version that is suited for teams of up to five persons.

Toggl is available on a variety of platforms, with synchronisation allowing you to roam between devices while keeping track of your work.

The beauty of Toggl, is how adaptable and configurable it is. The detailed reports are amazing, but in an otherwise feature-rich application, it's a shame there is no invoicing option.
