

- Certificate of Professional Competence in Music Production
- a degree in music production at the undergraduate level

3. Concert Technician

If you've always wanted to be a roadie for a high-tech band, working as a concert technician might be the perfect job for you. As a Concert Technician, your primary responsibilities will include maintaining and putting up all of the equipment used by a musician or band on stage before a performance, providing assistance to musicians while they are performing, and packing up equipment for transfer.

In most cases, a Concert Technician will work with well-established bands who have the financial means to employ a professional crew to take care of their instruments. During the time that you are on tour, it will be up to you to ensure that the instruments and equipment that the players use are in good shape and continue to function normally.

It should come as no surprise that the candidate for this position needs not only an in-depth knowledge of musical instruments and the ability to precisely maintain them in order to ensure a high level of production quality, but also a desire to travel (if not a case of downright wanderlust).

The following are examples of applicable classes and programmes:

- Professional Certificate in Live Sound Production

