

to make a broader framework that has a melody, harmony, and rhythm that are consistent with one another. The creation of a beginning, middle, and conclusion is achieved through the process of brainstorming.

What makes a good song? This is another extremely contentious topic, but it's one that I'm more open to discussing with you. The qualities that make a good song in terms of its substance are going to vary depending on who is listening to it and what interests them. It is entirely up to the individual. However, a good song in terms of its craft can be identified more objectively. It will typically have all of the elements listed above (i.e. melody, harmony, rhythm, beginning, middle, and end), and it will be put together in a way that is pleasingly recognisable while still being creative and remaining true to the message of the music. Think about prosody, which is the way in which the music and the lyrics complement and support one another. From a literary standpoint, having strong lyrics is not enough to make a song successful. When sung by the performer, they also need to have a musical quality to them.

A good song will develop as it goes along, taking us on a familiar path sprinkled with surprises along the way to make sure we're listening. A bad song, on the other hand, will remain stagnant throughout its entirety. The harmony (what the guitars, bass, and synths mostly play) will fit with the melody (what the singer sings) in a way that is pleasing to the ear, and the melody will use repetition to help the listener get used to the chord progres-