

After you have ‘bounced’ or ‘printed’ your completed mix, there are a number of providers from which you may choose to distribute the completed product to all of the major streaming platforms, including Apple Music and Spotify. These distributors include Distrokid, CD Baby, TuneCore, and a large number of others; they all provide services that are comparable to one another but have marginally distinct price structures. You should absolutely make use of a music distribution service rather than attempting to manage this procedure on your own because they make it a lot easier for you to do so.

You are establishing a brand for your artist identity with everything you do, and everything you create as an artist contributes to that image in some way.

When you release music, don't think of each release as a stand-alone event; instead, think of each release as part of a larger process. Make the most of the chance presented by your music to grow your audience on the various social media platforms. Bring in new fans and give your existing fans as many reasons as you can think of to keep listening to and supporting the music you create. At the same time, you should also try to bring in new fans.

The more at ease you are with developing a distinctive culture around your music, the more successful your career as a musician is likely to become. Bag an internship at a studio for a more in-depth look into how you may promote your music like a pro in this modern day and age.