

In addition, you will have the ability to delegate extra responsibilities such as editing, promotion, and even more.

However, there are potential drawbacks.

You need to be sure that both of you are in it for the long haul before moving forward with it. In addition, it is beneficial to plan up a timetable right from the start so that you are aware of the specific times each week that you will be recording.

However, there are no regulations in place here. In the event that your co-host is no longer available, you are able to carry on with the podcast even without them. You might even begin the show by yourself and bring on a co-host at a later time.

It is more vital to just get started than anything else, therefore let's decide on a name:

Choose A Name

If you take a look at the top podcasts on Apple, you'll see that there is a wide range of distinct names.

Some of them adequately describe the content of the show, while others don't really add much to the discussion.

You should go for a title that is more general than the subject you're covering.

Continuing with the hiking analogy from earlier, if we decide to call ourselves "The 14er Cast," what will happen when we also want to discuss topics related to backpacking and ultralight camping?

Instead, go with a name that gives you room to grow in the future if you choose that choice. It's possible that "Mountain Adventures (Above & Below 14,000 ft)" would be a good choice because it alludes to climbing 14ers while also allowing you the flexibility to discuss other topics if you so choose.

Once you're done finalising the name of your podcast, you should go and buy a domain name for it. There are several Internet Registrars that will help you secure one easily and quickly.

Show Format

Length

You'll find that a number of people who call themselves "experts" assert that there are ideal times for podcasts of varying durations. You do not need a podcast that is 28 minutes long because it is the typical amount of time spent driving. Or less than an hour because people's attention spans can only handle so much more than that.
