

Choose Intro Music

When it comes to podcast music, you need to ensure that the background music is free from any copyright or that you have all rights. You can certainly create your own music or get a track from a service. PremiumBeat and Epidemic are great for finding good instrumentals for your podcast.

It is simple to search, you are granted a complete licence, and they offer a variety of formats to choose from.

Most consumers don't require an endless subscription-style music service — just a song or two.

Get A Microphone

It is essential to have a high-quality audio recording, but a decent microphone for podcasting does not have to be prohibitively expensive. One of the most popular podcasting mics is the Audio-Technica ATR2100x-USB and the Shure SM7B.

The ATR2100x is both a USB microphone and has an XLR connection which lets you change your recording equipment without needing a new mic.

Alternatively, you can also get an entire podcasting kit which includes all the equipment required to start recording. Of course, you will have to get a PC or laptop aside from the recording equipment.
