

Iris is a programme that most podcasters would highly recommend to record your interviews while you are not physically present (or if your co-host does not record in the same room with you).

Recording & Editing

Alitu (The Easy Way)

Even the most basic operations like GarageBand and Audacity might feel quite complicated and overwhelming to someone who has never used editing software before.

It is clear that there is a significant amount of jargon involved in audio production.

If that is the case, then your best bet is probably to go with Alitu.

It is a programme for “podcast creating” that automates a lot of the complicated technical components, and it will practically build your episode for you. It is entirely based within your browser, so there is no need to download any additional software, and it can be used on any computer that is connected to the internet.

It is designed to be extremely user-friendly and can do a surprising number of functions, including the following:

- Takes care of audio cleanup
- Lets you add music
- Helps you piece together your audio segments
- Has direct publishing of your episodes.
